

In my excitement at sending the lab assistant over to the high school gymnasium to take advantage of the Chronotonic nexus for optimal View-O-Scope usage, I completely forgot one important thing:

We don't have a working time machine.

At least, as of the time I'm writing this, too many of the Chronomentometers are broken. I hope that you're one of the groups that's helping us fix them at <http://www.peachfrontier.com/cmm/gross.html>, but if not, no matter, there are plenty of crises happening here at the lab that we're trying to deal with.

But you've been up all night and I don't feel right just asking you for more help when you've already done so much. (If you'd like to stick around and help, I'd be overjoyed. There's a crisis going on right now that you can help with; just ask the lab assistant there for more information. And we could always use more help on the Chronomentometers.)

Our best estimates are that at 8:30am, we'll have repaired enough of the Chronomentometers to risk sending back the data that Professor Chronos wants. So if you like, you can take a break from now until 8:30am; catch up on some sleep, or go to a local restaurant for breakfast (I'm scrawling some suggestions below, but I'm not sure what's open right now). You can come back at 8:30am if you want to watch the View-O-Scope at the Chronotonic nexus, or if you don't make it we'll find some other way to get you the feed, so check your e-mail around then if you're not at the gymnasium.

Regardless, we are going to have a debriefing here at Peach Frontier Laboratories at 9am. So regardless of where you are, please be sure to see me back at the lab at 9am.
